The attention of owners, agents, and charterers of steamers is drawn to the provisions of the Post Office Ordinance, 1876, which comes into force on the 23rd instant.

Under the old Ordinance no notice was required to be given to the authorities of the departure of any ship or of any departure for Canton or Macao. Notice is now required at any departure, though with regard to sailing ships, the old rule will continue to apply. In other words, that notice need not be sent unless sailing ships.

Section XXV. requires that the first notice be given to the Post Office.

Section XXVI. requires that steamers plying regularly on fixed days, notice of any change in the day or time of departure, must be given.

Stamped correspondence may still be sent on board ships when required after the Mail is closed at the Post Office.

The Postmaster-General takes this opportunity of calling the attention of firms to the fact that the Post Office will not receive any letters or parcels, added to the establishment of a vessel, or any other articles, unless they are accompanied by a legal. Consignment's letters are exempted from passing through the Post Office, but no collection of such letters will be made for transmission, and no

EXTRACTS.

NO MORE SEA.

There shall be no more sea, no wild winds bringing Their stormy tidings to the rocky strand, With their salt gulls, and pale sea-flowers springing From out the barren sand.

No angry waves, from cliff and cavern hoarse,
To hear that trouble at its mournful lore, Bearing on shattered shells and spar the story Of one who comes no more.

The level and lost, where ebb no more may wander, Where the goodly world of living gold Nur slake his thirst where mountain hills meander Under the heavy load.

Never again through flowery dingles wending, In the hushed stillness of the sacred morn, By eldly woodpaths, where tall poppies, bending Reckon the rippling corn.

North whirling leaves like toy children gather In the grey haze of a simple place of graves, Round the low tomb where sleep his white-haired father, Far from the noise of waves.

There shall be no more sea, no angry waves Of love and youth, and childhood's sunny bays, Naught of daisy and change nor voice of weeping Bells the fragrant air.

Of that fair land within whose pebbly portal
The golden light falls not on fount and rill, Veiled by no fountain, stretch those shores immortal, Where there is no more sea.

SERENDIPITY.

An ungrateful world has probably almost forgotten Horace Walpole's attempt to enrich the English language with the term "Serendipity." To speak of a man as "gifted with mystical serendipity" is as much as to speak in an unknown tongue. The philologist mind would go to work on the expression, and probably resolve it into a "garbled word" of the sort introduced to science by the author of "Alice in Wonderland." Yet the term is not so easily to be dismissed. It denotes a quality of mind which is not based on accident and which most people are capable of observing the misfortunes of their friends. It expresses a more original condition of mind, and, as it is, a name for what is otherwise nameless, deserves a better fortune than oblivion. It is never easier to say which now, whether it is, and which will not survive, and the extinction of "serendipity" surely shows that, like the Dodo and the Moa, it has somehow failed to adapt itself to its environment. To find out the reasons of this want of success is not very difficult, but in the meantime it may be as well no longer to keep back from the uninstructed the meaning of serendipity, and the nature of the quality on its share in which Walpole plumed himself.

It may be ascribed in favour of Walpole's coinage that it expresses a certain form of luck which otherwise must go nameless. A person fortunate enough to be endowed by nature with serendipity, is a person who has the gift of putting his hand at once on the very thing that he happens to want. It does not matter how low the wish may be, but in his mind he finds what he needs or craves the moment he looks for it, or even when he has not yet begun to take the trouble to look. In a way he resembles the hero of Balzac's "Peau de Chagrin," but with a happy difference. The owner of the Peau de Chagrin had a desire, desire, desire, but with each satisfaction, the magic charm sank into smaller space, and the life of its possessor dwindled. There is no such drawback in the case of serendipity. The expression was derived by Walpole from a certain Prince of Serendip in a fairy tale, a kind of Fortunatus, who had the luck to find in an instant everything he was in search of. Probably the oldest observation on the term was among the causes which prevented him from enjoying the blessed survival of the fittest.

It is clear enough that serendipity is a very different thing from mere ordinary luck. We call a man lucky, for example, who escapes unhurt in a railway accident, or in the explosion of his domestic boiler, or when he up leaves in a new quarter full upon him; in short, a man is lucky who evades any of the numerous perils with which mechanical science has enriched daily life. This use of the word "luck" is of course still illegitimate, for the man is really more lucky who happens not to be involved in any accident at all.
But this sense of good fortune is quite distinct from serendipity. Take another kind of luck. We call a man lucky who is always meeting with chance gifts of fortune. The old lady who can recuse from a yelping poodle leaves him an estate, he cannot enter his name in a club lottery without winning the sweepstakes, all ordinary things go well with him, and he is consequently a happy man. But this is not serendipity, as it is not a result of pre-established harmony, for his comfort and well-being.
But serendipity is entirely distinct from this favouritism of fortune. The man who gets things without looking for them, or thinking of them, the man with serendipity has to be grateful for much smaller favours, but these are the favours which which he happens particularly to want.
The fairy or fate who presided at his birth made him the magical present of the power to evade small and tedious calamities. That the instance which Walpole seems to have had especially in his mind. Two men may be in doubt about a reference to a book, a reference which it is necessary for them to make for their mental satisfaction, that they should find. Give one of them indexes without number, as indexes have always been in this imperfect world, and he will labour in vain and search for hours with no result, but loss of time and temper. The other, the man with serendipity, has only to take up the first volume, and lo! there in his hand, under a chance to look at a newspaper, and what he wants, or a clue to what he wants, leaps to his eyes. His literary luck brings him the very passages that he would have most earnestly desired to seek out as soon as the idea that he needs them flashes through his mind. He may be in all other matters as helpless as a man who has no book, but his life may be a mere embryo of a career purpose, a tragedy of errors, all his investments may prove rotten, he may break every bone in his body in a series of accidents, but this one good thing of fortune he possesses.

Serendipity is not confined, of course, to a happy knack of hitting on the correct clue, a book at the time, though even this is no small boon, as people who lack it will confess. In all the minor matters of life the gift has its power, and the owner of the gift falls in with just what he has begun to wish for, and would soon have begun to look for.
He has had his heart on the subject of a piece of antique furniture, a park-like unusual acquirement, a house in the country within easy reach of town, the desirable thing falls as it were into his lap. The first book he has read is the one he wanted, a brother in a book street where he has lost his way happens to display the correct edition of the book he is looking for, and he is in the club is talking with the horse, or worse, to let the horse. The inheritance of the of the Prince of Serendipity is a small fortune in advertisements, and a world of trouble in running up and down in search of after what they need. In which the gift takes the shape of securing at the first venture service and governance, who are "resources," and who get married, just in time to prevent them from becoming old family retainers, of the tadious and trying kind. Saturday Review.

SHAKESPEARE AND DANTE.

Can you read Shakespeare? You think Dante greater? Of course you do, being an Italian. But you are wrong. Dante never got out of his own narrow world. He filled the great blank of heaven with his own spies and devils. He married his finest verse with false imagery to rail at a foe or flame a polemic. His eternity was only a millipede in which he never was able to forget the dogs he hated. A great man!
Oh, yes! but never by a league near Shakespeare. Symmetry, the half-moon of the poet, should be wide as the heavens and deep as the sea, in infinite comprehension. To understand intuitively—that is the breath of its life. Whose understanding was over as boundless as Shakespeare's? From the woes of the mind descended to the joys of the yielding virgin; from the agonies of thought and the conquer to the dim gleams of the dawn and the milkmaid; from the highest heights of human life to the lowest folly of the—comprehended all. This is the wonder of Shakespeare. No other writer was ever so miraculously impersonal. And if one thinks of his manner of life it is the more utterly surprising. With everything in his life, in his career, in his to make him cynical and revolutionist, he has never a tincture of either pessimism or revolt. For Shakespeare has to have as a mere man in Leicester's house—it would have given any other man the gall of a thousand Marats. With that divinity in him to sit content under the rule of a tyrant, and see the Southern Isles ride by in state, —one would say it would have poisoned the very soul of St. John himself. Yet never a drop of spleen or envy came in him, he had only a witty smile at false dignities, and a matchless universality of compassion that pitied the tyrant as well as the fact, and the loneliness of royalty as well as the loneliness of poverty. That is where Shakespeare is unapproachable. He is as absolutely impartial as a Greek chorus.
And thinking of the manner of his life, it is marvellous that it should have bent him to no bias, warped him to no prejudice. If it were the impartiality of a coldness, it would be easy to imitate; but it is the impartiality of sympathy, boundless and generous as the sun, which "shines upon the meanest thing that lives as liberally as the summer rose." That is where Shakespeare is as far higher from the earth—Aristotle, by Ovid.

ANCIENT HORSE-RACING.

It is a very remarkable fact, in spite of the excessive affection of the Greeks and Romans for all sorts of games and sports, horse-racing, in our sense of the word, had no existence among them. The great Greek capabilities of the horse were indeed, fully recognized and abundantly utilized; but the nature of the quality on its share in which Walpole plumed himself.
